DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (If known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The A.D. Naylor Building is a large 3 storey rectangular block with the narrow end on the street. The sides are wood clapboard, while the first floor (and the adjoining addition connected with it on the east side) is plate glass store front with aluminum 'sash'. The street facade above the present store front is metal (cast iron [?] and stamped tin). The second and third storey windows (6, 1/1 on each floor) are set between paired stubby Romanesque columns (characteristic of High Victorian commercial architecture). Above the third storey is an entablature of three friezes of semi-circular shells, swags, and so forth. The second frieze bears the legend 'A.D. Naylor Building'. Above this there is a false front, having its own bracketed cornice with similar swags on its own entablature. Above this is a small peaked gable with the date 1899. The whole front is painted white.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE (Include Personages, Dates, Events, Etc.)

The A.D. Naylor Building with its elaborate metal facade attached to an otherwise undistinguished wood block is one of Oakland's best representatives of this type of High Victorian commercial, false-front architecture. Taller than other buildings on the street, it forms a good foil for the railroad station of 15 years earlier -- it sets off the station and also forms a visual end to the commercial district of Oakland. [The entire west wall is exposed, showing a fish-scale pattern shingles -- unfortunately of ageing green asphalt.]
